The Soviet representatives in Korea have recently deprived the North Korean Communists of authority to make decisions concerning the Kaesong truce talks. The Chinese Communist political mission in Korea has moved to Changchun, Manchuria. While the mission was in Korea, the North Korean Communist delegates had a voice in all decisions on the cease-fire talks, but now, the Soviets and Chinese will make all the decisions. The North Korean government has only three representatives in the new organization, and they act only as liaison officers between the North Korean government and the new Sino-Soviet mission.
